Science is rarely a one-person job, done in solitude up in the metaphorical ivory tower. On the contrary: The exchange with others is an integral part of most scientists' daily life. Conferences, workshops and meetings provide the perfect opportunity for such an exchange. Here, you can present your research to other scientists and get their feedback, but also learn what others are doing and get to know the current developments in your field and beyond. The networking aspect of a conference should not be underestimated either: It is not uncommon that the people you meet during the coffee breaks or the conference dinner later become colleagues, collaborators, or even future bosses.

In this workshop, we will cover (almost) everything you need to know...

- before the conference, e.g. how to find the right conference for you, financing the trip, dealing with the various deadlines, preparing for the conference,
- during the conference, e.g. what makes a good talk or poster presentation, the importance of informal discussions during the coffee breaks and the conference dinner,
- after the conference, e.g. how to write up your presentation for publication in the conference proceedings.

What is discussed in this workshop is intended to help junior scientists at the beginning of their career to be well-prepared for a conference visit and make the most of it.

This event is part 1 of the series "Schlüsselqualifikationen für Promovierende". Interested persons should consider attending the complete series, but, of course, all events can be booked individually and they do not build on one another.
